BRIEF (THE PROBLEM) -

Indian women almost never style heritage jewelry with western clothing. Only wears at - weddings, festivals, traditional outfits. It appears at global Fashion weeks, without giving credits. These pieces are century old - unclaimed in modern contexts, it becomes "something to get discovered" for someone in a global stage.

Brief (the problem) - Indian women almost never style heritage jewelry with Western clothing. It stays for weddings, festivals, traditional outfits. Unclaimed in everyday modern contexts, it becomes something for someone else to discover and name, and sell back.

Core wordings here -

- Without giving credits.
- Unclaimed
- Something to yet discover.

My solution?

It has to be rooted, not positioned. Most Indian jewelry brands have the story. They just don't have the stage yet. The campaign is the stage. Office outfit, bold jewelry, styled like it was always supposed to be there. The edit is about showing it was never not modern.

The people who get this immediately are already doing it, bohemian stacking, layered accessories, eclectic mixing. Global influencers with exactly the audience we want. They're already reaching for cultural depth in how they style. ĀSLI gives them the origin they're missing.
